JACOB GROSS.

GROSS,

Eight Hours a Day. Se : Francisco Chronisle.

Edward Atkinson, who has for some time past been trying to ascertain how little a working man needs to eat in order to avoid starvation, has written an article denoucing the attempt to make eight hours a legal day's work. Mr Atkinson is one of the political economists who profess to desire the elevation of the working man, but is always making recommendations which, if followed, would result injuriously to them. The direct consequence of establishing that a man can exist on 18 cents a day, or thereabouts, is to encourage capital to reduce its scale of compensation so as to provide that amount for workingmen. Scoff as much as we may at the idea that the wages of the laborer are always determined by the subsistance limit, it seems to be an inexorable law in settled communities. The only salvalittle a workingman needs to eat in orsimil, it seems to be an inexorable law in settled communities. The only salvation for the laborer is to create artificial necessities. He must insist that shoes are absolutely essential: if he does not, his wages will be adjusted to the barefoot scale. He must demand a holiday dress for himself, wife and chidren; if he fails to do so, he will have to put up with the same rough sult for every day in the year. He must stand firmly by the preprosition that he ended to every day in the year. He must stand firmly by the preprosition that he ended to deep with sugar to sweeten them; if he does not, he is likely to be reduced to druking cold water. He is justified in trying to make eight hours a day's work; if he neglects to insist that such hours are long enough, he will probably be oblieged to work twelve or sixteen. In short, the workingman is justified in making any demand that seems reasonable to him for each take the resultable to he had been been been and the seems reasonable to him for each take the resultable is not we had. making any demand that seems reasonable to him for capital is nover backward in exacting all it can get out of the laborer.
